

Is it not enough that your governmental department have given away the airways to a choice few conglomerates that now have a virtual monopoly (chokehold) over what we citizens can hear and see, but now the same corporations are trying to shore up their power and stifle competition by trying to regulate what satellite radio offers to their listener? As a paid subscriber I would like to receive as many services as available, including weather and traffic reports, sans commercials. Traditional radio broadcasters do not have the right to censor what I have access to, especially under the glaring light of corporation self-interest. New technology always scares those who hold the keys to the accepted medium of the day. I'm sure television broadcaster screamed and hollered when cable networks first surfaced, yet they adapted and have survived after being forced to bring to their viewers a higher quality product or lose viewers. If we can have national pro sports championship series only available on cable, then we should be able to receive traffic and weather reports on satellite radio.
